"Deciding a legal challenge to a state university's practice of discriminating among applicants on the basis of race should be easy: Congress passed a law forbidding it – you may have heard of it; it's the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 - and so the university has to stop. The Supreme Court is in its fourth decade of making the issue unnecessarily complicated while putting itself at the center of the action. That tradition continues in its decision in Abigail Fisher's challenge to the University of Texas for its racial discrimination against whites and Asians. Justice Anthony Kennedy, writing for the majority, ignored the Civil Rights Act (as, alas, did the other justices). He decided that the Constitution allows state universities to engage in racial discrimination, but only if they really have to do so to gain the educational benefits of racial diversity. Justice Kennedy does not explain exactly how to discriminate in order to get these benefits at an acceptable cost to the principle of equal treatment. He leaves to a lower court the judgment about whether the University of Texas passes that test, but implicitly stands ready, as always, to second-guess. Past admonitions from the Court to universities have produced no detectable change to their practice of discrimination. The Court gets to keep pretending to may down the law, and the universities get to keep pretending to follow it." (National Review)

Some years ago, Representative Charles Rangel said that tax cuts were racist – or rather, that tax-cutters were. The way he put it was, "It's not 'spic' or 'nigger' anymore. They say, 'Let's cut taxes." In more recent days, Martin Bashir, an MSNBC host, said that "IRS" was the new "N-word." "Three letters that sound so innocent, but we know what you mean." Maybe we could agree that everything is racist, including "and" and "the," and be done with it?" (National Review)

FROM THE CHAIR

WE NEED NEW MEMBERSHIPS AND MEMBERSHIP RENEWALS FOR 2013. If you have not already renewed, please bring it to our August 19 meeting, mail it to our P.O. Box 1054, Winder, GA, 30680-1054, or go on-line at our web site for a credit/debit purchase. Please be encouraged to upgrade your membership to a higher level, if possible. We appreciate your support!

We need your help in selling and/or buying as many BBQ tickets as you can. We are looking for a great time on Saturday, August 24, 2013 at 5:00 PM in the Winder Lions Club. The Yargo Community Band will be performing, and we are using the new Shane's Rib Shack in Bethlehem as our caterer. Lots of food, music, and fun (door prizes)!

All announced Republican candidates for U.S. Senate and our 10th Congressional District have been invited to speak. We are expecting all of the Congressional and most of the Senate candidates to attend, if not all. It may be the first time all of these candidates will be together at the same event. With big decisions facing us in 2014, THIS IS YOUR FIRST MAJOR OPPORTUNITY TO HEAR FROM THESE FOLKS! Next year's BBQ will be after the July primary election. We are also inviting all of them to speak at our monthly meetings (one Senate and one Congressional candidate at a time).

We had a great meeting last month with good attendance. We heard from State Sen. Renee Unterman who gave us updates on health issues and the problem of human trafficking. We also passed the resolutions in support of Judeo-Christian moral values and opposition to the Common Core standards. Both resolutions passed unanimously.

Our next regular monthly meeting will be Monday, August 19, 2013 at 7:30 PM in the Winder Woman's Club. Our speaker will be Matt Thompson from the Barrow County public school system. He will give a presentation on the current status of BCS, and there will be some surprises. It will be worth your time! Make plans now to attend. Be early for a good seat!

THE PATH TO A BALANCED BUDGET SHOULD INCLUDE THREE SOCIAL SECURITY REFORMS

David C. John, Human Events, week of February 18, 2013

Projected federal budget deficits pose a dire threat to America's future. President Obama and Congress should settle on a firm path to balance the federal budget within the next 10 years. That path will necessarily include changes to Social Security. Demands that Social Security should be taken off the table are both misguided and wrong.

Although the Social Security trust fund has, on paper, bonds sufficient to last a bit more than 20 years, it is already running massive cash-flow deficits. Annual deficits will continue for at least the next 75 years. Repaying the trust fund bonds will take increasing amounts of general revenues that will either squeeze out other spending or cause even higher deficits. And after the bonds run out, the program faces automatic 25 percent benefit cuts for every recipient.

Real deficit reduction must go beyond just reducing discretionary spending. It should include the first steps toward fixing Social Security.

The grim financial picture

According to the Social Security Administration, Social Security has been running deficits since 2010 and owes $11.3 trillion more in benefits over the next 75 years than it will receive in payroll taxes. In order to pay all of its promised benefits, Social Security will require massive annual injections of funding in addition to what the program receives from payroll taxes.

Social Security's trust fund gives it the legal authority to receive general tax money to pay its benefits until about 2032. However, general revenue funds used to pay Social Security benefits would not be available to pay for anything else. That is why Social Security is part of the spending debate. And after 2032, Social Security benefits would be cut by 25 percent.

1. Fix the Annual inflation Adjustment

Social Security's annual cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) protects retirees against inflation reducing the purchasing power of their monthly benefits. Thus, the index used to set the annual COLA should provide the most accurate estimate of inflation. However, Social Security does not use the best available inflation index.

The current index fails to account for changes in how people buy products and services when the prices of similar items change. For instance, if the price of gasoline goes up while overall food prices drop, today's inflation index assumes that consumers will buy the same amount of both gas and food. In reality, of course, the amounts would change, as would the amounts of many other items, as consumers seek to make the best use of their limited income dollars.

This more realistic type of behavior can be measured in a "chained" index, which has been available since 1999 and measures inflation for about 87 percent of the workforce. This more accurate measure shows that inflation is actually about 0.3 percentage points per year less than is shown by the index that Social Security uses.

Using this index instead of the current outdated index would better reflect the actual increases in inflation that affect seniors. It would result in real savings to Social Security, especially over time, while still protecting the value of seniors' monthly benefits from being eroded by inflation. This more accurate measure would also reduce the cost of that protection to taxpayers.

Both the problem and its simple solution have been understood for decades. The improved index can be implemented quickly and without complication.

2. Increase the full retirement age

On average, Americans are living longer than in the past. Some of this improvement is due to conquering childhood diseases and other causes of early death. For this reason, when discussing Social Security, the number that really matters is how much longer people who have reached age 65 will live. That statistic is a better estimate of how long they will collect benefits.

Data from numerous government agencies show that more people are reaching age 65, and once they do, they are living longer than in the past. For example, the Centers for Disease Control say that just between 2000 and 2006, life expectancy for people who reached age 65 increased 0.9 years.

Yet today's Social Security – even after the coming increase in the full retirement age to 67 – has not kept pace with longevity increases that have already happened. To reflect this reality, the full benefits age should be increased still further to age 68 or beyond and then indexed to future changes in longevity. A gradual implementation should cause little or no disruption to the retirement plans of current workers while providing longtern savings.

3. Focus benefits neediest

Changing benefit levels for higher earners is not a radical idea. One of Social Security's original purposes was to protect seniors from poverty and economic hardship. Changing benefit structure would be a step forward returning to that goal.

Today, Social Security's benefit formula pays a higher monthly retirement benefit to lower-income workers compared to their average lifetime income than it does to those who had higher incomes. But the simple fact is that the money is not there to pay full benefits even as they are income adjusted today. To do so would require ever increasing taxes on younger generations.

Social Security could further focus benefits on lower-income workers by paying still lower benefits to those with high levels of non-Social Security retirement income. An even further step would be to completely eliminate benefits to those with the highest amounts of non-Social Security income.

One way to accomplish this goal is found in The Heritage Foundation's plan: Saving the American Dream. The Heritage plan makes Social Security a true insurance program that would protect every American against retirement poverty. It focuses exclusively on a retiree's non-Social Security retirement income and reduces benefits for those with incomes above a certain level and eliminates them entirely for retirees with still higher incomes. As a truer insurance plan, if a retiree's circumstances changed and his or her retirement income dropped, Social Security would quickly re-start the person's benefits.

Upper-income workers are more likely to work at companies that offer them either traditional pensions or retirement savings plans. They are also much more likely to have extra income to put away for retirement.

This change would strengthen the Social Security programs finances markedly while avoiding the large and continuous tax increases on younger generations who need to build their own savings. It would also pave the way for other substantive reforms to Social Security and retirement savings.

Improving Social Security for future

Although it is essential to reduce discretionary spending, that alone will not solve the budget situation. It is time also to focus on the real cause of America's fiscal problems: entitlement spending. The three improvements outlined above would help make Social Security more affordable, reduce today's cashflows deficits, and start the process of heading off 2033's automatic 25 percent benefit cuts. However, these reforms are just a start.

Actually fixing Social Security will require still more reforms. The nation should ask how Social Security can be structured to better meet Americans' needs in the decades to come. That discussion should lead to more fundamental improvements, among which should be ensuring that every American is protected from retirement poverty. Making the changes proposed above as part of the current budget debate is a good way to start that conversation.

"In late November, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported that the rate and total number of abortions fell by 5 percent from 2008 to 2009. After steadily declining from its peak in 1990, the abortion rate in the U.S. has leveled off in recent years, and the decrease represents the largest annual drop in a decade. The media were quick to attribute it, with little evidence, to more effective contraceptive use and increased access to the morning-after pill. Though the sharp single-year decrease is undoubtedly good news, the CDC survey included a number of depressing data, such as that the rate of abortions is very high for black women – four times higher than among whites – and that the abortion rate for women over 40 increased. The AP report included this comforting finding from the CDC: 'The majority of abortions are performed by the eight week of pregnancy, when the fetus is about the size of a lima bean.' So that's all right, then?" (National Review)

"See, I told you so. According to a report published in one of my favorite journals, Social Psychological and Personality Science, people who are exposed to organic foods feel morally superior – and are less likely to reach out to assist others. Lead author Kendall Eskine of Loyola University divided 62 students into three groups: an organic food group, a comfort food group, and a control group. Group one was given images of fruits and vegetables labeled 'organic.' Group two's photos were of desserts. The control group had pictures of oatmeal, beans, and rice. Researchers then 'determined participants' moral judgment by asking them how many minutes they would be willing to give up to help a stranger and how harshly they judged fictional situations,' according to The New York Daily News. Turns out, the participants in the organic food group were judgmental, self-righteous, smug, and unhelpful. They were 'kind of jerks,' said Eskine. Liberalism in an organic nutshell." (The Limbaugh Letter)

"Vermont has become the fourth state in which assisted suicide is legal. For the first three years, the law will include safeguards to make sure that the people being killed are of sound mind and really want to end their lives. After that period there will be no more need for such fussiness. Like the other three states with assisted suicide, Vermont has a suicide rate significantly higher than the national average. A new study finds that in one of those states, Oregon, the rate has been increasing sharply. So here at last is one government policy that is producing its intended results." (National Review)
